

Men and Women of Australia

The growth of the Labour movement does not mean ruin. It is synonymous with the growth and greatness of your country. Its roots are deep down in the soil of humanity, not in slavery and servitude. It stands for the unity of the mass as against the mass power of Mammon. It subordinates the individual to the principle. It moves forward to the point where the section will be subordinate to the movement in its entirety. It formulates unity, discipline, order and unified activity. By those instrumentalities it moves forward to the realisation of its ideals, knowing full well that it is only upon the basis of order, unity and discipline that the better and nobler order of to-morrow can rest in safety.

Women, like men, know when their bread is properly buttered for themselves and their children, and all the long history of factory legislation in this country, behind all of which Labor has been the moving force, leaves them in no doubt as to their real friends. Labor's policy is for the masses, and that includes, particularly, women and children.

Labor's motherhood and endowment and national insurance schemes speak for themselves. The endowment of motherhood has long been in the air—so long that mothers have ceased to regard it as other than a piece of political platform trickery. It is, however, part of Labor's approved platform, and will be brought into effective operation in the life of the next Labor Parliament.

Labor's national insurance will also provide for sickness, the industrial diseases that lay so many underground and factory workers aside, and, last but not least, for the primary producer who is often laid up without the means to provide for proper medical treatment and for substitute labor on his farm. This will have an immense appeal to the thousands of small, indigent cockies and returned soldiers.
